Character are made up of one or more components.

In the character 女 or 口 there is only one component

In the characters 字 or 男 there are two components

In the character 想 there are three components

In any character, one of these components is called 'the radical'. This is related to the word 'root'. It refers to the bit of the character which gives you (or originally would have given you) a clue about the meaning of the character.

So in the character 树 shu4 (tree) the left hand component is the radical

In many characters there is/are one or more components that hint (or would have originally hinted) at the pronunciation. These are called 'the phonetic'

In the character 想 the top components hint at the pronunciation while the bottom (heart) is the radical.

Look at the character 红

What does it mean? How many components are they? Which is the radical? Which is the phonetic? How many strokes are there in the character?
